Miss Katherine Cameron Michaux, the daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Jacob Michaux, and Mr. Edward R. Baird, Jr., of Norfolk, Va., were married at G.P. M. yesterday, in the home of the bride's purents, No. 223 East Franklin Street, the Rev. James Morris, of Grace Episcopal Church, officiating, and the ceremony being attended only by the relatives and connections of the contracting parties.

The spacious parlors, halls and dining room of the Michaux home were beautifully decorated in pink and white throughout, masses of pink roses and white chrysanthemums making a most effective showing against palms, smilax and maidenhair ferns. Rover and the Speckled Hen.

"Cut-cut-cutdah! Cut-cut-cut dah!"
the speckled hen had laid an egg, and she was telling all the barnyard about it.
Old Rover lay blinking in the sun.
Rover was very fond of eggs. His mistress did not allow him to eat them, but he made up his mind that he would have the speckled hen's egg that morning.

"You make as much fuss about your old egg as though the shell had a diamond
inside," he growled.

"Cut-cut-cut dah! I don't know but it has a diamond inside," the speckled hen answered.

"Let's open it and see," sly old Rover
said.

"Cut-cu-t-cut dah! Oh! no, I never open them till I have sat on them for three weeks, and then the lovellest fluffy chicks come out of them," the speckled three weeks, and then the loveled chicks come out of them," the speckled hen said.

"Well, if you'd open this one now, may be it would be full of diamonds." Rover insisted. "Come! Let's look in and seel I'll break it with my paw, and you can pick up the diamonds."

Rover took his heavy paw and broke the eggs—you know what it looked like, and in a minute Rover knew what it insted like, too. Poor speckled hen! She pooked at the broken shell, and the white and yellow egg all daubed on the grass, with Rover licking it up. And then she wandered sadly back to her nest and made up her mind that nobody should persuade her to break her eggs again till she had sat on them long enough to hatch the dear downy chicks inside.

But Rover smacked his lips, and wondered if he couldn't think up a story to tempt her to break the next one.
